Two different traditions in the study of language and philosophy come together magisterially in Paul Ricoeur 's (1913–2005) study The Rule of Metaphor (1975; trans. 1977), with Anglo-American and 'French' approaches thereby brought into dialogue. While there is much talk of transdisciplinary research in the humanities today, authentic examples are few and far between: with the work of Paul Ricoeur, one of the

Jean Paul Gustave Ricœur was a French philosopher best known for combining phenomenological description with hermeneutics. As such, his thought is within the same tradition as other major hermeneutic phenomenologists, Edmund Husserl and Hans-Georg Gadamer. In 2000, he was awarded the Kyoto Prize in Arts and Philosophy for having "revolutionized the methods of hermeneutic phenomenology, expanding the study of textual interpretation to include the
